In terms of our own game engines, a lot of our developers still struggle with how to think about games in a certain way. It's easy to see why. We understand how games work, but it doesn't feel right to use games to compare it to anything — to take a formula, some of the same mechanics, some different ways of thinking about it, and label it something that is fundamentally different compared to something we've had our eye on for years. We need to understand where we're at, and how we're going to evolve the art direction with that. There are plenty of amazing developers right now, but some don't do this and simply go with the flow. You don't get many titles out of the gate that are as good as some of our current best works. The ones that do, have done well for us — and those things are what we're looking for.

Last month we announced a new initiative to ensure equal access to quality child care in low-income neighborhoods and low-income schools. The new initiatives will make it easier for parents to participate in all types of child care across low-income neighborhoods. These two programs are currently the only programs in the nation to offer both, and at the heart of this strategy is a new pilot program to assess child care on all blocks from low-income to upper-income neighborhoods to help ensure all children have access to the types of care that best match their developmental needs and needs of interest..
